

Klavan: Timing Of Honduran Caravan Is Suspicious

The Honduran migrant caravan is currently making its way up through Mexico, and looks like it's expected to arrive at the southern U.S. border right before the midterms. Daily Wire podcast host Andrew Klavan thinks that timing is a little strange, and he explained what impact it could have on the upcoming elections on Monday's episode of "The Andrew Klavan Show."

"As the midterms approach, it is the right way to look at events like this: everything is being constructed and placed as a campaign issue," he said. "So the big story you're hearing about, or not hearing about if you're watching the mainstream media, is this caravan, this invasion of people coming up from Honduras, and now Mexicans are joining as well, they broke through the Mexican lines and regathered. It started out with four thousand, now maybe seven thousand, they say maybe as high as ten thousand.

He continued: "Trump is saying he's gonna cut off aid to Central American countries, he's saying he's gonna send the army down — which he's completely within his rights to do; they defend our border. Of course, they're gonna get here just in time for the midterms, right? We know as they get here — and I'm not usually suspicious about stuff like this but in this case I think you have to be — as we get to the midterms suddenly they're not gonna have enough food, because obviously somebody's paying for this, obviously somebody's supporting them along the way, we're gonna start to see this.”

Klavan pointed out that while the Democrats are remaining silent for the moment, once the images of crying babies start circling around social media, it will suddenly become a major issue.

“We'll start to hear about the humanitarian crisis of it all, and we'll start to hear what terrible people we are,” he explained. “But really, we cannot take in everybody. It's a problem because if we stop them — we don't want anybody to get killed, we don't want there to be violence — but if we just let them in what happens? Next caravan; the next day they start building another caravan.”

Source: <https://www.dailywire.com/news/37460/klavan-timing-honduran-caravan-suspicious-jacob-airey>

[Disclaimer]