

North Korea fires ballistic missiles as US sounds off 'end of regime' warning over nuclear programme

North Korea has fired two short-range ballistic missiles towards the sea, South Korea's military has said.

In a statement it said two launches had been detected from the North's eastern coastal Tongchon area around mid-day on Friday.

Tongchon is about 60km (37 miles) away from the inter-Korean border.

The area was apparently closer to South Korea than any other missile launch site North Korea has used so far this year.
