Greetings from Tyler,

Something huge is brewing, and it promises to be one of the most embarrassing, gut-wrenching experiences this nation has ever endured. Media companies eventually have to figure out how to save themselves. When something becomes so well known, or is at long last given credibility by one of media's "trusted sources," the dam starts to crack, if you'll pardon the reference.

As you probably already know, the NYT has run a story admitting that the scandalous laptop computer is authentic. Horribly, there are videos all over the place where the mainstream claim is that it was planted Russian disinformation. Some of the videos are of the big guy claiming that he's never discussed anything, and wouldn't. The "appearance" and all that. Brace yourself. Most of the stuff that threatens to humiliate everyone is so bad it can't be shown, or even referenced.

World leaders are laughing every time they think about the lack of understanding, and the kindergarten talk that has been on display every time our presumptive vp takes to a podium. The pretender is about to go overseas to embarrass us further. That seems a safe prediction.

If there were a concerted effort to weaken, fleece, invade and bamboozle, it's hard to know what else they could do. There's so much damage already, it's hard to see how we claw back an identity. Are there really that many gullible, brain-damaged people in the U. S.? Were people really swallowing the bizarre accusations against the former President, bad actors brimming with righteous indignation all the while?

It looks like nearly all their accusations, they were guilty of having committed. Some of us haven't forgotten that outright vitriol that spewed out of the mainstream in their universal contempt for a man who, not only loved the country but wanted it to flourish. We're finding out about people who were insinuated into advisory roles who undermined those they were supposed to serve. That's a major scandal the historians will have to figure out, assuming they haven't been canceled and falsely accused too.

Our favorite little Dr. has emerged to say there's a strong possibility that another wave is on its way, and we have to be "flexible enough" to return to stringent regulations. Some of us weren't flexible in the first place, but then again we live in a state that seemed to recognize the folly of authoritarianism elsewhere. That it would even happen anywhere in the United States was breathtaking. But there were "consequences." People were left without a choice. Obey, or else. Maybe it's time to pull up stakes and go somewhere else. Many did.

It's not clear whether the mega facilities we just found out about were involved in nefarious experiments, illegal in the U. S., or not. Some of the aerial photographs of these facilities are shocking. They're huge! The American taxpayer paid for all of it, but was not told. What on earth! Ukraine has been almost an euphemism for a money pit, and there are vast sums unaccounted for. Meanwhile, you might be a "danger" to society if you believe any number of things that are proving out. They sent the head of an oppressive agency out to speak that blather this week.

We can dismiss some of this as "old news," and the media will undoubtedly try. But something tells us that all is not well. Blatant lies are being dug up, and are going to be on display. Suddenly (or not so suddenly where we're concerned) the evidence dismissed as Russian disinformation and banned from discussion on social media sites is proving true. It should start an avalanche. But we've seen the media arrogantly dismiss the truth as something that can't be relied upon for years. They better get it together this time. No doubt panicked meetings are taking place in tall buildings. How will they couch information that is reaching critical mass, that they've been running away from for years?

Where might the churches be? They dare not speak of the fact that the great blessings from God are being denounced. Apparently a bunch of congressmen, we're talking a hundred and some odd, have sent a letter to the supposed executive saying that global warming, or climate change as they've had to re-define, is still the greatest threat. What did we do to deserve this?

It's time to face the reality that the Ruler of the universe may not be amused by what's going on here below. Maybe there's a reason everything is going south, and everyone is coming north. Enemies are suddenly a threat. Putin keeps dangling the nuclear option. China is sailing warships near Taiwan. Russia is “helping” the administration with the re-reinstatement of the Iran nuclear deal. Under the circumstances, how can this be? The great deception better be good. We can hardly wait.

Mark
