Greetings from Tyler,

There has to be an explanation for the attack on the very core of what made America a great country. A possible answer is, they're just trying to tick us off. The speeches, the decisions, the whimsical creation of a truth governance. The appointment of a truly comical figure, one who has humiliated herself publicly on many an occasion, and been flat wrong in public pronouncements. But then again, she says what her employers want us to hear.

We can only assume the ludicrous move was an attempt to calm the hurt feelings of those who have seen themselves losing control. If twitter won't brand, ban, and de-platform the purveyors of "misinformation," at least the state is moving in to fill the void. That ought to fix the ultra-whack jobs who think free speech should be allowed. The Constitution itself has become the enemy, and all attempts to align with it must be stopped!

It's an obvious response to the purchase of twitter, and the bitter tears. A stranger female couldn't have been chosen to head up the new bureau. We know it, and they know we know it. That's why the obvious conclusion is that they're just trying to irritate us. We've been irritable about the obvious corruption too many times. This time we have to recognize it for what it is, an obvious ploy that has no chance of passing Constitutional muster. The great villains of history have all employed such an agency, and this one will be ridiculed, lampooned and ignored.

Everything is settled science, and we'll either acknowledge that 2+2 equals five, or suffer the wrath of agencies corrupted to protect the establishment. They know global warming doesn't hold water. That's why they won't discuss it further. Especially after the main "scientists" got caught making up the "proof." If you're a "denier," you can't be a serious individual. Who comes up with these monikers? It wouldn't matter, except the media repeats terms that are meant to demean. They've stopped trying to prove their point.

The life-blood of the economy is oil. It's in almost everything, to one degree or another. So that's been made the enemy. It's destroying the planet! They've got to stamp out oil production to save the planet. It defies imagination. Words that can't be said unfortunately come to mind.

The same thing happened with religion a long time ago. A party line has been established, and any variance with it will result in instant dismissal. It's such a joke. Empty churches are thriving because they're getting paid to settle migrants. They make them disappear, and get paid. Watching, as I did years ago, one of the famous TV preachers trying to explain the doctrine of the trinity, he fell all over himself. Finally, in exasperation he said, "It's a sign of your faith that you believe it even though you can't understand it." Oh, that's great. In the statement was the "doctrine" that you can't be a Christian if you refuse to sign on to the un-explainable belief. There you have it. Either sign on, or you can't be in good standing with the rest of the believers. They can't explain it either, but they're all about getting rid of you if you won't "confess" like they've all done. It seemed a small price for admission into the "Christian" fraternity.

Garner Ted Armstrong said that God is logical. Everything makes sense. The complexities of nature strain our ability to understand, but everything makes perfect sense. He controls our environment, regardless of the ignorant rantings of those paid to be lunatics. If some outfit claims they stand for diversity, inclusion, and are busily saving the planet, it's time to cut bait.

Monday, May 1 came the revelation that the Supreme Court is about to reverse the federal abortion law. The one that found a Constitutional "right" for abortion at any stage. It's been almost fifty years, and finally a case has been considered. It's been opined that the release of this "draft" decision of the Supreme court was leaked in order to blunt the effect, and throw shade on the release of the movie 2000 Mules. The chief Justice confirmed that the draft is legitimate. Stand by for the rage of the main characters. "Pocahontas" nearly burst a blood vessel, she was so mad. Somewhere along the line the word "doxxing" got invented. It took place long before the internet, but we're being told to treat it like it's a new invention. Now they've published the physical addresses of the Supreme Court justices. Surely they've got protection, but can you imagine the scene?

Apparently this is the hill the idiots have chosen to die on. The trinity of politics is seen as under assault. "How dare they!" Kamala demands. The pretend administration is going to do everything within its power to see that this precious “right,” sloppily asserted amid the feminist wave of the ‘70’s, is upheld if they have to pass a law! That would do it. Pass a law, that will then be challenged all the way to the same court. Now that will have to be carefully written.

It’s a doctrine that justifies the “re-imagining” of the Supreme Court, or at least it’s packing with like-minded nitwits, like the one just appointed to head the truth commission. Howling at the sky is also a perfectly reasonable option, preferably on the front lawn of a Supreme Court justice. You can’t underestimate the dignity of the people on the ground. Incredibly, the red-headed spokes-lady is justifying the “protests” before they happen. You might say she’s calling for them. “As you know, the United States has a long history of protests, and we certainly encourage people to keep it peaceful...” So a mob shows up in front of your house, bullhorns blaring, chanting like a bunch of magpies. I think they just proved the opening point. They’re just trying to tick us off. Not that some can’t be paid to make a nuisance of themselves. When someone calls the police, is that what they’re going to be told, “There’s a proud tradition of protest?”

Somehow the whole concept has been corrupted. What was intended as a conversation with your representative has turned into mob intimidation. The red head is all for it. That means whoever is authoring the teleprompter is all for it. You’d think the sky was falling when the states will call their own shots. Can you believe the list of major corporations lining up to pay for travel expenses? It seems like all the big names are hurrying to let us know they too are on board with whatever drives you to distraction. Make them go broke. They worship money. Maybe they’ll change their tune when they realize the majority is not moved by all their self-righteousness.
